FOREWORD.

The Education Committee of the London County Council consider that a short account of the arrangements made by the Council for the education of defective children in special schools would probably be of service to the authorities of the hospitals in London. The following account, with particular reference to the medical aspect of the special schools system, has therefore been prepared by Sir William Hamer, the Medical Officer of Health and School Medical Officer, and was ordered by the Education Committee on 26th March, 1924, to be printed. Should any members of the clinical staff of a hospital have child patients who, they think, would derive benefit by attending any of the schools mentioned and who are not already so doing, they might communicate either directly, or through the Almoner's Department, with the School Medical Officer, The County Hall, Westminster Bridge, S.E. 1.

EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Notes on the Provision made in London for the Special Education of Ailing or Defective Children, from a medical point of view.

The Council provides facilities for the special education of children who are unable to benefit in ordinary elementary schools in the undermentioned types of special schools:—

Day and residential schools for the blind;

Day and residential schools for the deaf;

Day schools for the mentally defective, physically defective, hard of hearing, myope and stammering.

The Council also secures places in residential special schools for the epileptic, etc., in the country or at the seaside.

(A complete list of the Council's schools is appended).

Schools for the blind and for the partially blind (myope classes).

For admission to blind schools, children must be too blind to read the ordinary school books used by children. Those suffering from all conditions of impaired vision of a non-infectious character are admitted. Blind children may be required to attend such school from the age of 5 upwards. At the age of 12 or thereabouts suitable children are transferred to residential schools for special trade training. The blind children remain at school until the age of 16.

Children who suffer from high or progressive myopia, or who should for other reasons not strain their eyes, are admitted to the myope classes. The classes are small, the teachers specially trained and the ordinary methods of reading and writing are not employed; the children stand up to blackboards so that writing is done at arm's length. For oral instruction, children are drafted into adjacent elementary schools. Special attention is paid to mental work and the cultivation of muscular memory, and whereas in the ordinary school silent reading is encouraged, in the myope classes children are largely instructed by word of mouth. The myopes as a rule leave school at the ordinary leaving age (14).

Children are admitted to both types of schools only after examination by the Council's ophthalmic consultant and the schools are regularly visited by an ophthalmic specialist.

Arrangements are made with the Metropolitan Asylums Board to send children with chronic infectious conditions of eyes, e.g., keratitis, blepharitis, trachoma, ophthalmia, (but not congenital syphilis), to convalescent country schools if of school age (5-14).

Schools for the deaf and for the hard of hearing.

The deaf child is legally defined as a child too deaf to be taught in a class of hearing children in an elementary school. Deaf children may be admitted from the age of 5, but attendance cannot be enforced until the age of 7. As it has been found that the greatest advantage is derived by commencing special education at an early age, parents are urged to allow their children to attend as young as possible. At the age of 13 or thereabouts suitable children are transferred to residential schools for special trade training. In schools for the deaf, oral methods of instruction are used, special attention being paid to lip-reading and pronunciation, and the great majority of children respond to these methods; but in the case of the few oral failures, or in the case of those who in addition to being deaf are also blind or mentally defective, special provision is made in a residential school at Penn in Buckinghamshire. The deaf children remain at school until the age of 16.

The "hard of hearing" classes are provided for those who are not quite deaf but are so far hard of hearing that they require special education. Children attend for part of the time in the ordinary classes and are mixed, as far as possible, with ordinary hearing children, and so soon as they have acquired sufficient lip-reading to re-enforce their defective hearing powers they are considered for re-transfer to an ordinary school. The hard of hearing children leave at the ordinary leaving age (14).

Children are only admitted to the schools for the deaf or hard of hearing after an examination by the Council's consulting aural surgeon, who visits the schools at regular intervals. Both deaf and hard of hearing schools are visited daily by a nurse, who attends to discharging ears.

Schools for physically defective children.

A physically defective child is one who is incapable, by reason of physical defect, of receiving proper benefit from instruction in ordinary public elementary schools. The usual ground for admission is some cause of crippling, or such organic disease as would render attendance at an ordinary school dangerous or disadvantageous but which might not prevent the child being safely educated in a small class under constant supervision. The types of children who form the majority are those suffering from paralysis, quiescent tuberculosis of the bones or joints, congenital deformities, and children crippled through valvular heart disease and unable on that account to take part in the life of an ordinary day school. A certain number who have suffered from rheumatism, chorea and the like, also attend, but often only temporarily, as they return to the ordinary school as soon as their physical condition permits.

An ambulance service is provided to take children who reside at a distance from the school, or who are unable, otherwise, to attend. Those who are physically fit and who can attend by means of a public conveyance are expected so to do.

A trained nurse, who is in constant attendance, takes the ambulance rounds, attends to the wants of the children and supervises meals. A special dinner is provided for all children at mid-day, to the cost of which parents contribute in accordance with their means.

A provision exists for a certain number of recumbent cases in each school, and all the children are under constant medical supervision. Visits are paid by the school doctor at least every four weeks and there are also periodical visits by the Council's consulting orthopædic surgeon.

Children can only be admitted after having been certified by one of the Council's medical officers specially recognised by the Board of Education for the purpose. Attendance at these schools can be enforced after the age of 7, but in certain circumstances younger children may be admitted if the parents are desirous of such a course and if the attendance does not exclude a child of a higher age.

The attendance can be enforced up to the age of 16.

Children suffering from trivial deformities, epilepsy, or with offensive discharges from sinuses which need frequent dressing, are not admitted.

Open air schools.

Open-air schools of two kinds are provided for children of the age of 8 and upwards:—

(a) Day open-air schools for debilitated and anæmic children, and those who may be suspected of a tendency towards tuberculosis.

(b) Day schools for those children notified to the Borough Medical Officer of Health as suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis, or from tuberculous glands which have not broken down.

Children are conveyed to the schools on the Council's trams; and a nurse, who is in daily attendance, supervises meals, weighs, measures, and takes temperatures of the children. Specified periods are set apart during which all the children rest on stretchers and they are supplied with meals whilst at the schools.

The schools have regular medical visits—in the case of the ordinary open-air school by the ordinary school doctor—in the case of the schools for children suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis by the tuberculosis officer for the district, who acts as a school doctor for the purpose.

In addition to the day open-air schools referred to in (a) above the Council has three residential open-air schools for children who are slightly less debilitated than those who attend the open-air day schools. The children stay at these residential schools from four to six weeks.

Schools for mentally defective children.

The mentally defective child is legally defined as one not being imbecile, and not being merely dull or backward, is, by reason of mental defect incapable, of receiving proper benefit from the instruction in the ordinary public elementary schools; but not incapable by reason of such defect of receiving benefit from instruction in a special school or class. The children admitted are those whose mental age, as estimated by tests, is less than three-fourths of the normal, provided that they have in other ways shown themselves incapable of education in an ordinary school. Those who make no progress, and show themselves incapable of being taught to manage themselves and their affairs, are excluded as imbecile. The minimum age for compulsory admission is 7, and the children remain at school until the age of 16. Separate schools for special trade instruction are provided for elder children of either sex. In all schools there are small classes with specially trained teachers, and a specially adapted curriculum. Children are only admitted after an examination by one of the Council's medical officers specially recognised by the Board of Education for the purpose. The certifying officer examines the child, and also considers any information which exists as to the family and previous history of the child, in addition to the reports as to the conduct and progress from the school previously attended (if any). The schools are visited periodically by medical officers for the purpose of returning to the ordinary schools any children who have made sufficient progress, or for the purpose of excluding any who have proved absolutely ineducable. At the age of 16 the case of each child is specially considered, and if it is deemed necessary, steps are taken to afford them such protection as is available under the provisions of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913.

Epileptics.

The Council has made arrangements for sending children suffering from chronic epilepsy to such an extent as to unfit them for an ordinary school, but yet whose mental state is such as to permit of their deriving benefit from education, to epileptic colony schools if they are between the age of 7 and 13, and subject to the parents' consent. The authorities of the epileptic colonies have the right of selection. If admitted, children may be retained until the age of 16.

Stammering classes.

Arrangements exist for children of 8 years and upwards who stammer to attend classes taken by specially trained teachers, for a course of three months, which is repeated if desirable.

W. H. HAMER,

School Medical Officer.
